

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

This study entitled "A Comparative Study on Verb-Formation Processes in English and Indonesian" aims to describe the processes of English and Indonesian verb-formation, together with their differences and similarities. The total number of the data is 55 English verbs taken from Time magazine of 2006 and 61 Indonesian verbs taken from Intisari magazine of 2007. Then, all of them are analyzed one by one.

The researcher finds five kinds of English verb-formation – derivation, conversion, compounding, back-formation, and clipping – and five kinds of Indonesian verb-formation – derivation, conversion or transposition, reduplication, compounding and borrowing. Moreover, the usage percentage of English verb-formation processes is as follows: derivation 19 (34,55%), conversion 20 (36,36%), back-formation 3 (5,45%), compounding 11 (20%) and clipping 2 (3,64%). While, the usage percentage of Indonesian verb-formation processes is as follows: derivation 38 (62,29%), reduplication 9 (14,75%), transposition 2 (3,23%), compounding 3 (4,92%) and borrowing 9 (14,75%).

Next, the differences of English and Indonesian verb-formation processes are as the following: English verb-formation may undergo back-formation and clipping processes, but Indonesian verb-formation may not. Then, Indonesian verb-formation may undergo reduplication and borrowing processes, but English verb-formation may not.

Furthermore, the similarity of English and Indonesian verb-formation processes is that English and Indonesian verbs may be formed by derivation, conversion and compounding.
