

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

Language is very useful. In daily life, people cannot be separated from language because language is a means of communication. By using language, humans can express their feelings, desires, emotions, and ideas. Language has two components, that is, sound and meaning. In effective communication the message which is conveyed by the speaker must be caught by the listener. Communication itself does not always happen face to face. In other words, the speaker and listener need an instrument to make a communication. One instrument of communication is radio. In radio communication, the speaker and listener have special way to communicate, for example the use of restricted codes and specific terms.

The data analysis shows that the restricted codes which are used by breaker and the couple are as relax as those which are used by the breakers and those of the same age. Besides the similarity in restricted code used, there is also the difference for example, when the breaker talks to the couple she uses secret restricted codes, such as: Ni... Ni... and Jupri and the conversation inserts the romantic words, such as: yang and chrup....ahh and rustles showing love. Meanwhile, when the breaker talks to the same age breaker the words used are the common words but they are restricted, for example: masih, tahu, langsung.

Communicating in radio communication, the breakers also have specific terms. These specific terms sometimes sound strange for common people.

These codes are only known by both of them. Further, there are a lot of specific terms used by the breakers. Most of them are strange for common people, while a few of them are not. For those who are familiar with the terms, they will never have miscommunication.
